Hong Kong's Muslim community makes up just four per cent of the city's population, but is deeply rooted in its culture and history. Indian sailors and merchants first arrived on ships from the British East India Company back in the 1840s, followed decades later by Chinese immigrants from the southern coasts of the Chinese mainland, and in more recent years by Indonesian domestic workers. Today, the city's Muslim population includes Indians, Pakistanis, Chinese, Indonesians and Arabs. That diversity is reflected in Hong Kong's culinary scene, with more than 60 halal-certified restaurants that serve everything from Cantonese to Middle Eastern dishes, all prepared according to Islamic law. Here's where to dig into the best halal food in Hong Kong.
